The Early Records of the Town of Newport, now in the custody of the Newport Historical Society

At the time of the British evacuation of Newport, in October, 1779, the early records of the town were carried away in a small vessel accompanying the fleet, in charge of the Tory Sheriff, Walter Chaloner.

This vessel was wrecked in Hell Gate, and the records remained under water for several days, becoming thoroughly soaked before they were rescued and placed unopened in a New York store house.

When they were returned to Newport, in 1782, it was found that the earliest and latest volumes were completely destroyed, and the others were in a dilapidated and perishable condition. They were placed in the vault at the old City Hall, but there were no facilities for their proper care, and even the tenderest handling produced further decay.

As these old documents are necessary in obtaining clear titles to property, back to the early days, and are of great value and interest to antiquarians, the Newport Historical Society felt that an effort should be made to rescue the papers from such an unfortunate condition, and agreed to care for them and superintend their restoration. Under a resolution of the City Council, in January, 1894, the records were deposited with the Society, and since then the volumes have been arranged by the librarian and then preserved by the Emery Record Preserving Company in Taunton, whenever appropriations have been made by the city, for this work.

The Emery Silk process renders the damaged records accessible and insures them from future deterioration. It consists of preserving each leaf or document, between sheets of transparent silk, which leaves the writing as clear as before, and even clearer after exposure to the light and air. New margins of inlaid paper which protect the writing at the edges of the original leaves help also to make a strong binding.

Since the Newport records have been deposited with the Historical Society, many volumes have been arranged, preserved and indexed. Hundreds of visitors have examined them, and many letters have been received and answered concerning them. They are always carefully guarded, and are placed in the vault especially erected for them, when not in use.

All who appreciate the charm and interest of these old papers are cordially invited to see them while they are in the custody of the Society.
